Abstract

This paper summarizes theoretical and empirical studies based on financial development and economic growth as well as their indications and limitations. Most of these researchers began to show interest in this subject in the early nineties and this can be connected with the rapid development of financial markets and globalization of the financial system. Although the academic work and literature based on this question is huge it still does not answer crucial questions. Theoretical and empirical methodologies give answers and evidences on this relationship, but each of them has some limitations which cast a shadow over evidences and results.

Key words: Financial Development, Economic Growth, Causality direction
